Organized Living Teaches Architects How to Maximize Small Spaces in a New Continuing Education Course through Hanley Wood University

October 15, 2013 (Cincinnati, OH) Organized Living, a leading manufacturer of high quality storage systems, now offers a course for architects that is approved by the American Institute of Architects (AIA) Continuing Education System (CES). The free course is available 24 hours a day, seven days a week at Hanley Wood University. Architects who complete the course and pass the test receive one learning unit (LU).

The course, titled "Making the Most of Small Spaces with High Quality Storage Systems," helps architects acquire new knowledge and skills in a category that is tremendously important to today's home buyers and renters. Key learning objectives include:

- Information on organizing systems for residential homes and multifamily applications; specifically exploring adjustable shelving units.
- How best to select a high quality storage system that maximizes small spaces.
- How to choose building products that are cost effective to install and also meet or exceed the expectations of current and future clients; whether they be Millennials or seniors.
- An understanding of design requirements for storage spaces stipulated by the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the concept of Universal Design.

"Architects are looking for educational opportunities to gain knowledge and understanding of new technology, applications and methods. The Organized Living course delivers all of those relevant to the storage and organization category," explained Dan Brezine, national sales manager for commercial residential division at Organized Living. "Plus architects can stay up to date on new products available in storage and organization, learn best practices, and finally, think creatively and develop new ideas."

In addition to online courses, Organized Living offers in-person seminars.
